

Your honor, as far as I'm concerned, there is no such thing as justice in this case. Nothing can bring our daughter back to us. I am not sorry that the death penalty was taken off the table; that would have been an easy out for this menace. Let him stay alive and slowly rot.

I believe he is nothing more than a bully and a weak minded coward who preys on others. He fancies himself a survivalist while anyone can see he's a scared little man on the run. He's the fool who goes through life too ignorant to realize he is a fool. Meredith has exposed him.

Meredith was probably one of the few people in this world who would have spoken to him again the next time she saw him, and would have accepted him without judgment. I have no doubt that her goodness and light intimidated the hell out of him, so he struck out in fear.

I'm sure he thinks he snuffed out her light, but the truth is she is stronger and brighter than ever, while he is diminished. I believe that on a soul level she may have decided to take him out, so he could never harm another innocent person.

I was shown a vision of him as a mass of darkness with one tiny pin point of light. Had he the courage to nurture that pin point of light, he could have been someone worth counting in this world. Instead he made one conscious choice after another to become the pathetic shell of a man that he is. In the deepest part of his soul I believe he knows this.

God may choose to forgive him; however, he is not worth the time and energy it would take me to do so. My focus will remain on all the good Meredith stood for and still does. She lives on; her energy is strong and expansive.

Thank you for your time.
